ABOUT THE NATIONAL SEMINAR

Law is a changing phenomenon. Law can be seen as both an instrument of positive social change and also as a means of confirming existing social arrangements and resisting social change. Ideals of gender, racial and ethnic equality are being pursued to bring about changes through legal reforms. Human rights and right to development are the emerging paradigms in the progressive outlook of the new millennium. The discussion over the rights of the homosexual and transgender is due to the transformations in legal and social fields. As far as family and related fields are concerned, law faces many new developments e.g. property rights of women, daughter as a coparcener, live-in-relationship, domestic violence. The basic purpose of law is to protect the society from any forms of internal or external illegal activities and offences. In today's globalized era law has transgressed in to every area where there is an act or omission and redressal is necessary under the administration of justice. To accomplish this objective amendments have been made time and again in both substantive as well as procedural laws.

With the advent of information technology, law has to face many challenges. New legislations have been evolved to analyse the offences relating to information technology. Enacting legislation is not enough until it is properly implemented, interpreted and protected and this responsibility is given to the judiciary by the Constitution of India. Through Judicial Activism, judiciary has witnessed new changes in the field of law. Since the last two decades judiciary has adopted an activist policy and directed the other organs of government to fulfill their duties properly. Many new dimensions have emerged in the fields of Environment Laws, Criminal Laws, Constitutional Laws and other fields of law.

The aim of this Seminar is to reinvigorate the intellectual and policy debates about the link between law and social change, social democracy and the reduction of harm, crime, etc. through the alleviation of inequalities and building of more socially just and inclusive societies.
